Dear Margaret,

Thank you for your letter. It was very good and very beautiful, much more so than anything I would be able to write you. I am very thankful that you are at least in these things which are most important so much better than I am, because the consciousness of my inferiority makes it all the easier and more meaningful for me to like you. But what your letter really means to me, I will not try to express, but I will try to act in accordance with it.

As you may be able to tell from the fact that I write in English, I am not quite well yet. I have been working hard. Today we examined 12 boys, and after supper I went to the school to take histories of 10 girls. They seemed to have little trouble in getting used to me, and the fact that I could make them feel so much at ease - they were all smiling before they left - in spite of such personal questions gave me at least some satisfaction.

It is pretty bad!
Here at home Margrits plans to go to Ocean Drive, - a four days on the road for one day's at the beach, has raised considerable turmoil. Mother is completely exhausted, father is irritated, Margrit is violent, and as usual I am the culprit. The details are all too silly to interest you. Anyway, I suppose that we will be in Philadelphia either Monday or Tuesday evening ~~in~~ <sup>at</sup> ~~the~~ <sup>the</sup> ~~place~~ <sup>place</sup>. Whatever happens then depends on you. For some of your things we have room. I see no reason why you should send your things up by express unless you absolutely want to. We could make another trip for them the next weekend, if that seems more convenient. If it is still possible, I would consider changing the apartment, though.

I wish I could write you ~~an~~ better letter, but I am completely numbed by the current events, and the best thing I can do is to go to bed in order to be as juiceful as I possibly can tomorrow. I will read your letter again, and be with you in my thoughts and thank God that he has sent you to me as good as you are. Please give my regards to Alex and your parents.

Dein
